

The Cherokee Trail: Uncovering the Secrets of the Wild West

Families also took cows for milk, as well as horses, food, utensils, clothing, and camping gear. Men brought along guns and knives for hunting and protection. The pioneers also carried shovels, axes, plows, and other tools in the wagons because they would need them for farming once they reached Oregon.

Some people tried to bring furniture or stoves, but these items were simply too heavy to transport. Many folks were only a few miles into their journey when they realized they had over-packed their wagons. With no other choice, they began throwing things out.

Snowstorms come early in the mountains. If settlers left too late in the spring, they risked getting trapped in the mountains near the end of the trail. That could be deadly! They also had a better chance of finding clean water the earlier they left. That is, water that wasn't contaminated with diseases like cholera.
